THE SHIRK.

They could see his many blunders,
They could see his careless work,
They could see the far-off wonders
In the visuage of the shirk,
And they noted in his talking
That his mind was far away,
And they saw his listless walking
To his desk, from day to day.

Plainly saw the boss his failings. Plainty saw the boss his failings,
Every day 'twas just the same,
And with harsh and stern assailings
On his shoulders went the blame,
And with bitter threats he spurred him
To the tasks, but never he
Who so meekip sat and heard him
Told the things they couldn't see.

Never once this shirker uttered. That his thoughts had gone astray. To a little room, close-shuttered. From the sunight of the day. Where a mother watched and waited for a little fellow's bed; And his heart was heavy-freighted with a constant sense of dread.

None could see his baby lying
Pale and still upon his cot.
None could hear his fitful crying.
None could feel the fever hot
That those little cheeks were burning.
As he saw and felt and heard;
None knew where his mind was turning
When his careless work occurred.

Sorther jeered him and they blamed him.

And sometimes they threatened, toe;
And als big employer shamed him.

As he thought he ought to do,
But one morning he came smiling.

And ther shamed to hear him tell
They could give no their reviling.

Fir als boy was getting well.
